Do we believe that God loves us? Do we really believe that He loves us unconditionally? Or do we believe in a god who is waiting to pounce on us at any given moment, ready to strike us down at some random instant in our lives when we are steeped in sin? Is He hoping that we forget one sin in our past that He can't wait to hold us accountable for? Is He so picayune that in His judgment any trifle thing of our past will disgust Him so vehemently that He will be forced to condemn us to eternal absence from His presence? Is the heart of God so small, so embittered?

One might say that scrupulosity is the spiritual equivalent of Obsessive-Compulsive Disorder. We are never good enough, never clean enough to win God's love and affection. We must ritually create a world where we bring all things into order to make our world clean and safe. We must do the same with our spiritual lives. There is no room for mistake or failure. Every little suggestion of sin is an affront to God and must be expunged, over and over again. Every hiccup in our daily life becomes the possibility of sin that insults God and causes Him to hide from us. In our scrupulous and rigid world there is no room for God's mercy, forgiveness or compassion. There simply is no room for God. Our journey becomes the self-induced, long-suffering trail of the condemned, trying to make sure that every speck of dust along our path is removed from our midst. Then God will love us, then God will be with us, when we are pure and innocent again.
